CASE STUDY · MARKETING DIRECTOR

Louis Bélet SA

Rebuilding the brand strategy for an upmarket positioning and strategic diversification

HEAD OFFICE	ROLE	PERIOD
Les Gasses 11, Vendlincourt	Marketing director	2024

POSITIONING · BRAND IDENTITY · DIVERSIFICATION · INBOUND MARKETING

A coherent, recognised brand in two markets: luxury watchmaking and medical

THE CHALLENGE

Louis Bélet SA, a Swiss company that has made high-precision cutting tools for luxury watchmaking for 75 years, had never clearly defined its market positioning. Although a leader in Switzerland, its upmarket image lacked consistency across client touchpoints, and no marketing or communication strategy was in place.

The company struggled to stand out from its competitors, aligning itself with them rather than defining its own identity. It also depended mainly on the watchmaking sector, which was in steady decline.

THE SOLUTION

As CMO, I brought a fresh perspective from my B2C experience, refocusing the company on its clients and introducing disruptive practices to break B2B routines.

I led a complete brand overhaul, building a strong and differentiated identity. I also launched a marketing plan to diversify into the medical sector, with a targeted B2B communication strategy that included upgrading the corporate materials and specialist content.

THE RESULT

Thanks to this overhaul, Louis Bélet's image gained consistency and distinction across its markets. The company is now seen as a key player not only in luxury watchmaking but also in the medical sector.

The teams and senior management now have clear guidelines, with a medium- and long-term vision for their strategic investments of time and resources.

TODAY

The new brand strategy completely rethinks the philosophy that had prevailed until then. By moving from outbound prospecting to attractive inbound marketing, the LBSA house now draws clients in. The customer journey and experience have moved upmarket, as have the products and services. The offer stands apart from competitors through an image strategy rather than a price strategy.

Building awareness in the medical sector relies on useful, educational content and a careful selection of exclusive trade fairs consistent with the brand image. This approach strengthens the company's credibility and opens new growth opportunities.

Is your company worth more than your clients perceive?

A 30-minute call to identify the decision that matters most to you. No commitment.

BOOK A CALL